The Greenville Enterprise says harvest is at hand, and in view of the damage done to corn by weavils it may be interesting as well as profitable to give a Texan's mode of protection against this pest. In housing his corn he put on the cornhouse floor, about four feet apart, two open bottles containing bisulphide of carbon. The mouths of the bottles were covered with a single layer of cheese-cloth, and each bottle covered with an old broken box to keep it in position. The corn was thrown into the house, as usual, over the bottles, and the result is said to have been that neither weevils nor rats did any damage to the corn. Fifty cents worth of the bisulphide was sufficient to protect five hundred bushels of corn, and it would be equally efficacious, we presume, in the case of wheat. We give the experiment for what it is worth, and it is a second to the control of the case of wheat.
